New Jersey Judiciary Celebrates Probation Week

This week, during National Probation, Parole and Community Supervision Week, the New Jersey Judiciary recognizes the contributions of the probation professionals who make a difference in the lives of thousands of New Jersey citizens every day.

"A probation officer's work is challenging, but it can be rewarding," said Robert Sebastian, Assistant Director of Probation Services. "We are fortunate to have so many talented and dedicated probation workers on staff. Their work is greatly appreciated by the Judiciary, and by the community we serve," he added.

Probation professionals fill a wide variety of roles in the New Jersey Judiciary. Many of them supervise adult or juvenile offenders and ensure their compliance with court-ordered conditions such as finding and keeping jobs, attending school, adhering to curfews, attending substance abuse treatment programs, and paying fines and restitution. Other probation officers work in the criminal courts, conducting investigations on convicted offenders and providing information to judges before sentencing. Family courts also rely on probation officers, who research domestic violence cases and make risk assessments of alleged batterers; conduct investigations in child custody disputes; and devise rehabilitation plans for juvenile offenders. Child support collections also are overseen by the Office of Probation. In all of these roles, probation professionals are responsible for resolving conflicts and helping clients while at the same time protecting the community.

To be a probation officer requires exceptional observation, investigation and listening skills. Probation officers must gather and analyze information and involve themselves deeply in the lives of their clients. They must build relationships with communities and organizations, offer advice, motivate others, and, above all, commit themselves to changing lives.
